Description:

The digital and the almost ubiquitous existence of computers, mobile devices and computer networks turns data and information accessible and create new challenges. It impacts not just the way we preserve data and information but also how we store and organize, forcing the new forms to curate, discover and tackle with the economy of authorship, intellectual property, editorship rights which are being eroding traditional barriers to read, use, explore and transform data and information into value.

As a result, the needs and services provided by libraries need to consider such a digital context with a smart move to adapt and evolve in order to provide digital information along with more traditional services in an sustainable way.

This presentation discusses some of the challenges and applications that the open movement may provide for the years to come.
